
A friend's retirement default and a founder's parents' one-fund portfolio weren't a knowledge gap. That was the design working as intended.

Government accounts and retail portfolios are converging on the same default: hand the decision away, make the handoff as simple as possible.

A single global index fund needs zero explanation. A default government account needs zero decision.

A cross-border allocation into Korea, the Gulf, Southeast Asia, or Central Asia needs a memo.

Simple capital doesn't reject the emerging-market story. It never reaches it, because reaching it costs the one thing simple capital was built to avoid: attention.

If your capital needs an explanation to arrive, you're not selling return. You're selling back the judgment already outsourced. Full post below.
